

Me Magazine: Dungeons And Passions

Growing up, me and my dad played a lot of Dungeons & Dragons together starting when I was around ten. He knew that I was very intrigued by the world of fantasy and science-fiction, due to my love of the Star Wars and Lord Of the Rings/Harry Potter movies.

He was determined to get me into the game that had taken a death grip on millions of nerds and geeks worldwide, and to this day we still have in-depth conversations about the plethora of lore and monsters that seep into the heart of the game. We've spent hours screaming over the excitement of campaign-ending fights, and have developed a deep bond over the amount of time we've spent playing together. I cherish the time I play with my friends but most importantly, I cherish the time I spend with my father.
